What is the difference between satin vs semi-gloss paint?

However, the subtle differences in satin vs semi-gloss paint can make one a distinctly better fit for your project than another. Satin finish paint has a slight sheen, so it reflects light better than both eggshell and matte finish interior paints.

Should I use satin or semi-gloss exterior paint?

Painters often mix the two: satin for main surfaces and semi-gloss for accents. This gives your home a balanced, polished look that lasts. Choosing between satin and semi-gloss exterior paint depends on the area you're painting and the look you want. Satin paint works best on big areas like siding, stucco, or brick.

What is the difference between semi-gloss and matte paint?

Semi-gloss paint is quite shiny, which means that it can sometimes show cracks and imperfections. Satin paint is slightly more matte, which means that it does a better job at hiding pockmarks, dents, scrapes, and other minor flaws. The winner: Satin paint

Is semi-gloss paint waterproof?

The same shininess that gives semi-gloss its durability offers superior stain resistance. Semi-gloss paint tends to be more water resistant (and in some cases waterproof) than satin paint. While satin paint is water resistant, it's not quite as stain resistant as semi-gloss paint is.

To answer the satin vs. semi-gloss discussion, note the differences between the two paint finishes. These differences will vary on the level of light reflectivity and sheen.
